Spiritual capital is widely celebrated because it nurtures the spiritual, the moral, and the economic. The suggestion that America's spiritual capital should be sacred, paralyzing, and revered is a mistake that we need to question. The pendulum has swung too far in the other direction, from an emphasis on the material and physical to an overemphasis on the spiritual. It's time to bring the two back into balance. The key is to find a way to integrate the material and the spiritual in a way that is meaningful and relevant to our lives.

Traffic is a tool of political and social power, and when used improperly, it can have disastrous does. The right of the people to speak, to assemble, and to protest should be protected. However, there should also be regulations to ensure that these activities do not impede the flow of traffic or infringe on the rights of others.

The recent events in Ferguson have raised important questions about the role of the police and the death penalty. The use of lethal force by law enforcement agencies must be carefully scrutinized and the consequences of such actions must be considered. The death penalty is a cruel and degrading form of punishment that should be abolished.

Oppressed individuals need to be empowered to speak out and demand change. The fight for justice is not just for those who have already achieved success. It is for all who struggle against oppression and discrimination. The struggle continues, but we must not give up hope. Together, we can make a difference.
